

The question has been raised as to whether the soft tissue of a human finger could actually be preserved in fossil form. Below are photographs of a fossilized worm from our excavations. This fossil was also deposited in Cretaceous layering. The soft tissue of the worm has been preserved intact, verifying that the same is possible with a human finger.

